

Bird Marella Wins Bail for Marine Corps Veteran in Internationally Publicized Extradition Case

Principals Ekwan Rhow and Naeun Rim, along with associate Christopher Jumin Lee, obtained the release on bail of a pro bono client charged in a high-profile internationally-publicized extradition case. The client, a U.S. Marine Corps veteran, had been detained pending extradition to Spain based on allegations relating to an incident at the North Korean embassy in Madrid.

The Bird Marella team faced a number of challenges due to the extremely strong presumption against bail in extradition cases. Yet, they successfully argued that “special circumstances” existed based on the fact that most of the evidence against the client consisted of uncorroborated accounts from representatives of North Korea, a country with which the United States has explicitly chosen not to enter into an extradition treaty due to the inherent untrustworthiness of their justice system. As a result, the Court acknowledged a unique “special circumstance” with no precedent in previous extradition case law, ultimately granting bail for Bird Marella’s client.
